Rebellion of Adolescence?

During the early years of adolescence, it is probably most likely to get sidetracked off to the wrong path due to the emotion-based decisions teens make. This is, in fact, completely normal behavior for an adolescent because there is a certain part of the brain that is more dominant at this time, the amygdala. The amygdala is in charge of the decision making in teens, which makes teens more sensitive and emotional than adults.

Offered at $895,000

Camp Activities

- team activities
 - sports events
 - games
 - contests
- volunteer activities
 - trips to orphanage
 - senior homes
 - animal shelters

So, what do you think you could do to stop this sidetracking off to another unwanted, possibly harmful road? Well, since around the age of thirteen years, the child will begin their early adolescence, simply guidance can help tremendously. This is the time of developing abstract thoughts and moral reasoning according to a psychologist, Eric Erikson. Also, according to another psychologist, Pieget, this is the stage where a child either becomes competent in their existence or feel inferior to the existences of others.

Activities that promote that the development of creativity and uniqueness of the child, yet at the same time keeps the child from straying off to immorality are exercised at this camp. More specifically, we grow the teen's ability to work as a team. In society, it is not always based on individualism. Most of the times, society is based on the ability to work together sometimes in unfavorable conditions with unfavorable people. Therefore, the main activities we promote at this camp is team sports and volunteer work is also available to those who wish to help out. Hopefully, this camp will be a resource to learning oneself and developing along the proper path.
